Forgotten History:

The Marconi Scandal

By Dave Yorkshire
dave_yorkshire@yahoo.fr

It is the fashion to divide recent history into Pre-War and Post-War conditions. I believe it is almost as essential to divide them into the Pre-Marconi and Post-Marconi days. It was during the agitations upon that affair that the ordinary English citizen lost his invincible ignorance; or, in ordinary language, his innocence [...] I think it probable that centuries will pass before it is seen clearly and in its right perspective; and that then it will be seen as one of the turning-points in the whole history of England and the world. – G K Chesterton, 1936.

A collection of oily political crooks (Is there any other kind?); Lord Murray, Sir Rufus Isaacs and Mr. Lloyd George at Cap Martin in southern France.

Last year and the year before marked the hundredth anniversary of one of the most important cases in political and legal history, yet the event came and went without anyone marking its passing. There are reasons for this, as will be explained. It was a very complex series of events and has been difficult to distil into a short article such as this without leaving out anything essential. Nonetheless, I believe I have condensed the most important events and actions in this sordid affair. Firstly, we must begin with a little background history.

Guglielmo Marconi was a young Irish-Italian man of genius, who, at the age of 22, invented a crude form of wireless communication and offered it to the Italian government, who, in their ignorance, refused it. He came to Britain, where he founded the Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company and in 1901 made the first transatlantic wireless signal. In spite of this, Marconi was making very little money and share prices were low, as the profits were put back into further experiments in wireless.

Enter Godfrey Isaacs, well-acquainted with all the European financial houses – and, yes, he's Jewish. Within six months of meeting Marconi, he was running the company. Within a couple of years, the Marconi Company had become a truly global concern. It is important to point out here, for reasons that will become clear, that each branch of Marconi operated as a separate company, but yet all were under Isaacs' umbrella. Godfrey Isaacs also had a brother, 'Sir' Rufus, who in 1910 had risen to the rank of Attorney General in the Liberal government.

In 1911, the Imperial Conference approved the plan to erect state-owned wireless stations throughout the British Empire. The Postmaster General, the Jew Herbert Samuel was instructed to put the contract for the project out to tender. On 7th March 1912, Godfrey Isaacs' tender on behalf of the Marconi Company was accepted. The contract took time and had to be tabled before the House of Commons upon completion, the date being 19th July.

Immediately after the tender was accepted, Godfrey went to America to develop the American Marconi Company. The British Marconi Company held over 50% of its shares, which meant what was good for the British company was good for the American. Isaacs bought out the American company's main rival with money from the British company, then sold it to the American company. The American company could then create two million shares, 500,000 of which Godfrey Isaacs took responsibility for, and all of which were guaranteed by the British company.

Isaacs then came back to Britain and told brother Rufus and his other brother Harry of his arrangements, selling 50,000 shares to Harry. Rufus refused, stating it would be improper, given his involvement in the Liberal government, but then bought 10,000 from Harry, which he apparently thought was fine. Rufus then sold 1000 to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, David Lloyd George, and 1000 to the Chief Whip, Lord Elibank. This was on the day before the shares were actually created. When the shares were put on public sale, they were 50% dearer.

Rufus then acted as a stockbroker for Lloyd George and Elibank, buying and selling shares at a tidy profit. No records were kept of the transactions between the Isaacs, Lloyd George and Elibank. Elibank also bought 3000 shares for the Liberal Party itself from an unnamed source, all the time, we must remember, before the contract had been established and signed. What is also unusual is that between the time of the tender and the time the contract was to be tabled, Rufus Isaacs, the Attorney General, was brought into Prime Minister H H Asquith's cabinet.

The contract itself was coming under increased criticism as being too advantageous to Marconi. The more advantageous the contract to Marconi, the less beneficial it would be to the taxpayer, but the more beneficial to company shareholders. Herbert Samuel, who knew what was going on, tried to push the contract through and further investigation of the rival Poulsen system was shelved. Samuel made much of the fact that the Titanic had used the Marconi system to signal for assistance, which he claimed had saved hundreds of lives. The sinking of the Titanic was a boon for Samuel. On 8th August 1912, Cecil Chesterton's journal the New Witness then launched this attack:

Isaacs' brother is chairman of the Marconi Company. It has therefore been secretly arranged between Isaacs and Samuel that the British people shall give the Marconi Company a very large sum of money through the agency of the said Samuel, and for the benefit of the said Isaacs. Incidentally, the monopoly that is about to be granted to Isaacs No.2, through the ardent charity of Isaacs No.1 and his colleague the Postmaster-General, is a monopoly using antiquated methods, the refusal of competing tenders far cheaper and far more efficient, and the saddling of this country with corruptly purchased goods, which happen to be inferior goods.

This was both followed and preceded by a spate of criticism of the contract in various newspapers and journals. Finally, on 11th October, a Parliamentary Committee held an enquiry in the House of Commons. A lie was never told in relation to the accusations because Rufus Isaacs formulated the accusations himself so that those concerned could easily rebuff them in such a way that would convince everyone there had been no impropriety. Had the politicians bought shares from the Marconi Company? No, they hadn't. Had they bought shares in the company with the governmental contract? No, they hadn't. It was left to L J Maxse, editor of the National Review finally to get to the crux of the matter on 12th February 1913:

Over four months have elapsed since the discussion in the House of Commons, but Ministers have done nothing whatsoever to dispel the mist of suspicion overhanging the affair. Mr. Samuel stated that Ministers "will be most ready to appear before"—I am quoting him—"the Committee." One might have conceived that they would have appeared at its first sitting clamouring to state in the most categorical and emphatic manner that neither directly nor indirectly, in their own names or in other people's names, have they had any transactions whatsoever, either in London, Dublin, New York, Amsterdam, Paris, or any other financial centre, in any shares in any Marconi Company throughout the negotiations with the Government.

The next day, the newspapers were full of Maxse's stand and relished the reopening of the Marconi enquiry. Then, the day after that, a strange article appeared in the Parisian newspaper Le Matin, which stated in French a gross libel against Maxse:

Mr. Leo Maxse, the eminent Editor of the National Review, protested vehemently against the way in which this disagreement had been concluded. He imputed that Mr. Herbert Samuel, the Postmaster-General, whose idea it was to enter into negotiations with the company, had entered into an arrangement with Sir Rufus Isaacs, the Attorney-General, also a member of the Government and brother of Mr. Godfrey Isaacs, managing director of the Marconi Company.

All three had bought shares in the company at an average price of about 50 francs, at which these shares were quoted before the opening of the negotiations with the Government, and had resold them at a profit rising to as much as 200 francs per share accordingly as the negotiations enabled it to be foreseen that the contract would be concluded.

Mr. Maxse attacked at the same time the fact that the contract had been signed in haste on 7th March, without having been brought before Parliament as it should have been.

This gave Rufus Isaacs charges he could easily defend himself against – charges that were completely fabricated – and, indeed, he did so, along with Samuel, at the hearing of the libel case against Le Matin, even though Le Matin had already printed a retraction in its London newspaper at the behest of Rufus himself. He also admitted freely to dealing in American Marconis to give the impression that all was above board. What is curious about the whole affair is that Rufus was in Paris when the clumsy libel was printed and back in London to oversee the retraction. It begs the question: did Rufus have the information for the story sent to the newspaper?

Certainly, G K Chesterton believed something was afoot and wrote his satirical poem "Song of Cosmopolitan Courage" about the whole affair for his brother's journal, the New Witness:

I am so swift to seize affronts,
  My spirit is so high,
Whoever has insulted me
  Some foreigner must die.

I brought a libel action.
  For The Times had called me 'thief,'
Against a paper in Bordeaux,
  A paper called Le Juif.

The Nation called me 'cannibal'
  I could not let it pass—
I got a retraction
  From a journal in Alsace.

And when The Morning Post raked up
Some murders I'd devised,
A Polish organ of finance
At once apologised.

I know the charges varied much;
At times, I am afraid
The Frankfurt Frank withdrew a charge
The Outlook had not made.

And what the true injustice
Of the Standard's words had been,
Was not correctly altered
In the Young Turk's Magazine.

I know it sounds confusing—
But as Mr. Lammle said,
The anger of a gentleman
Is boiling in my head.

It all at least served to speed up the Parliamentary Enquiry, the next session of which took place the following week. The Liberal politicians twisted, sweated and snarled throughout, Rufus flying into affected rage at questions about him not having mentioned buying American Marconi shares in the first session, while David Lloyd George insisted on having made a loss on his purchases, as did Rufus. What this had to do with the point was anyone's guess and they had certainly not bought them with the intention of making a loss.

Another interesting point to come out was whether the 500,000 shares Godfrey Isaacs held were his or the English Company's. Godfrey claimed they were his, which meant him selling them at cost to others before they were put on public sale was fine; but where was the record of the transaction for the sale between him and the Marconi Company? The company books were inspected and it could not be found – it did not exist.

During the various hearings, all manner of luminaries were called to give evidence from the worlds of journalism and politics. One last note about the parliamentary enquiry is that one of those luminaries was a certain Winston Churchill, whose name had also cropped up as one of those trading in Marconis. He appeared, denied everything, complained about insults to his honour and stormed off. And that was that.

The enquiry served little purpose in any case, for the jurors were selected according to the party majorities in the House of Commons; and so there was a little murmuring from the Conservative representatives; Rufus and Lloyd George were given a slap on the wrist and that was the end of the matter. Later, the writer Lytton Strachey would describe the Liberal government as: "a sink of iniquity tinged with the worst kind of Hebraism."

It was not the end of the matter for Cecil Chesterton, however, who had been pursuing the matter with some vigour in the New Witness. In particular, he saw Samuel and the Isaacs brothers as being the source of the corruption, as the tender had been arranged between them. Chesterton had also made much of the fact that Godfrey Isaacs had been at the head of or implicated in no less than twenty bankrupted companies and someone with a sandwich board with words to this effect had wandered up and down the street outside Godfrey's office.

Godfrey's solicitors wrote to Chesterton demanding that he stop bringing Godfrey's honour into question until after the Liberal-biased Parliamentary Committee, threatening legal action if Chesterton persisted. This is what Chesterton had wanted all along; although, given who the Attorney General was and the foregone conclusion of the Parliamentary Committee, it was perhaps foolish. Godfrey was no stranger to the courthouses and had a penchant for suing people throughout his life. On 27th February 1913, Chesterton wrote in the New Witness:

We are up against a very big thing... You cannot have the honour (and the fun) of attacking powerfully entrenched interests without the cost. We have counted the cost; we counted it long ago. We think it good enough—much more than good enough.

Other writers had done most of the criticising, yet Chesterton took full responsibility upon himself. Chesterton was an honourable man fighting the deceitful and unscrupulous when the entire system and those controlling it were against him. The judge himself, Mr. Justice Phillimore was against Chesterton and his counsel, Ernest Wild, from the beginning. One can see this quite clearly in the court records from his constant interruptions while either was speaking and from the way he virtually did the prosecution's job for them. Here is one such example:

Judge: It is not an imputation against a man that he has been a failure. There is nothing in your libel to say that because Mr Godfrey Isaacs is a bad man of business, the Government ought not to deal with the Marconi Company. The allegations were that the prosecutor is a fraud and a cheat.
Wild: There are two parts. First we say he is not the sort of man they ought to deal with because of business failures. Secondly because—
Sir Edward Carson (Prosecutor): That he is a man that ought to be sent to gaol.
Wild: That is what I am coming to.
Judge: I have not seen the first part.
Wild: (to Godfrey Isaacs) I suggest that you were not exploiting the public but these rich gentlemen?
Isaacs: I was exploiting nobody, sir.
Judge: How can you exploit rich people if you are not a promoter?
Wild: The witness was in most of these companies from the start.
Judge: That is not being a promoter.
Isaacs: I do not think I ever invited people to put money into any one of these companies. I joined them myself as one of those who put money into somebody else's company.
Wild: Here are cases after cases of failure.
Isaacs: That is my misfortune.
Judge: You might as well cross-examine any speculative widow, Mr Wild.
Wild: A speculative widow would not be concerned in the management.

This last point reveals just how peculiar the governmental contract was: as Wild pointed out, there was a vast difference between Isaacs and a speculative widow and would Justice Phillimore have not thought it strange if the government had given a huge contract to that widow, especially if she had had close relatives in the cabinet and if the contract had been very favourable towards her?

Another peculiarity of the case was that Chesterton wished to defend himself by showing Godfrey had engaged in misconduct, which meant that the burden of proof was now on him and not on Godfrey. Chesterton also wished to prove wrongdoing by those in government, in particular Samuel, Rufus Isaacs and David Lloyd George, which, given the outcome of the parliamentary enquiry and that the Attorney General himself was in the witness box, was an impossibility. This might seem naïve of Chesterton, for he could not possibly win under such circumstances, but winning was not as important as showing the public how corrupt Britain's institutions had become.

Chesterton's point of attack was the contract arranged between the government and Godfrey. Justice Phillimore immediately insisted that it had nothing to do with the case "whether the contract was badly drawn or improvident." The jury, guided by the discourse made permissible by the judge, found against Chesterton. The judge, of course, could easily have sentenced Chesterton to a stretch in prison, but, given public attitudes to the case, fined him £100 and ordered him to pay Isaacs' costs (which were not inconsiderable).

The fines were paid for largely by his brother and generous members of the Conservative Party. Interestingly, this showed a disparity between those at the head of the party, who refused to press the Liberals on the issue in Parliament, and the lay members, who were outraged and did all they could to help Chesterton. This only confirmed Chesterton's belief that those at the top of both parties were in cahoots and involved in activities to the detriment of the British public. One can see his point, for, through Herbert Samuel and other influential Jews, Semitophilic leaders, past and future, from both parties, such as David Lloyd George, Winston Churchill and the sexually ambiguous Arthur Balfour, were all to come under the influence of Chaim Weizmann, the Zionist leader and future first president of Israel.

As early as 1910, Weizmann was pulling strings in the government, as a letter to fellow Jew Moses Gaster from 6th November shows, in which he was trying to hurry through the naturalisation process to become a British citizen and asked Gaster: "perhaps you could do something for me at the Home Office. You must surely know Winston Churchill very well, also the Under-Secretary of State [Herbert Samuel], and a word from you would settle the matter."

As an epilogue, the fates of our protagonist and antagonists are important, for it shows just how corrupt the political establishment had become. David Lloyd George, of course, became Prime Minister. Herbert Samuel became 1st Viscount Samuel and 1st High Commissioner of Palestine, as Zionist Jews took charge of British affairs in the Middle East. Rufus Isaacs became 1st Marquis of Reading, Lord Chief Justice, Viceroy of India and, again critically, Foreign Secretary. In contrast, Cecil Chesterton died in a French hospital of infected wounds sustained in the field of battle in December 1918, believing he had served his country and the forces of liberty, when, like so many, he had unwittingly served the interests of the corrupt politicians he had once fought against, who had sent millions off not to war, but to an industrial slaughterhouse. Afterwards, Chesterton's wife, Ada, dedicated herself to the poor, founding a shelter for homeless women.

When Isaacs was made Lord Chief Justice, the great poet Rudyard Kipling, who had followed the whole Marconi affair with great interest, wrote one of his finest poems and a personal attack on the character and ethnicity of Rufus Isaacs, "Gehazi", blending the narrative of the eponymous corrupt and avaricious Biblical character with that of Isaacs:

Whence comest thou, Gehazi,
So reverend to behold,
In scarlet and in ermines
And chain of England's gold?
"From following after Naaman
To tell him all is well,
Whereby my zeal hath made me
A Judge in Israel."

Well done, well done, Gehazi!
Stretch forth thy ready hand,
Thou barely 'scaped from judgment,
Take oath to judge the land
Unswayed by gift of money
Or privy bribe, more base,
Of knowledge which is profit
In any market-place.

Search out and probe, Gehazi,
As thou of all canst try,
The truthful, well-weighed answer
That tells the blacker lie --
The loud, uneasy virtue,
The anger feigned at will,
To overbear a witness
And make the Court keep still.

Take order now, Gehazi,
That no man talk aside
In secret with his judges
The while his case is tried.
Lest he should show them -- reason
To keep a matter hid,
And subtly lead the questions
Away from what he did.

Thou mirror of uprightness,
What ails thee at thy vows?
What means the risen whiteness
Of the skin between thy brows?
The boils that shine and burrow,
The sores that slough and bleed --
The leprosy of Naaman
On thee and all thy seed?
Stand up, stand up, Gehazi,
Draw close thy robe and go,
Gehazi, Judge in Israel,
A leper white as snow!

The other Isaacs brother involved, Godfrey, died in 1923, the same year Guglielmo Marconi joined the Italian Fascist Party, which shows the fallacy of fascists being necessarily "anti-Semitic". Two years later, the Marconi Company was in financial trouble. The Times published an article in which it stated:

Over a period of years, substantial profits were reported, inordinately large fees paid to certain directors, and shareholders were lulled into a false sense of security by receiving appreciable dividends. Yet all the time, as it now turns out, the company was in fact suffering heavy losses by unwise investments (several of which had nothing to do with the company's business), by advances to subsidiary companies which turned out to be bad debts, and by foolish speculation in foreign currencies.

These things happened for the most part during the period that the late Mr Godfrey Isaacs was managing director of the company. Altogether the losses have involved the writing down of the assets to the extent of approximately £6,000,000 [...] Seldom in the history of a joint-stock enterprise have losses of this magnitude been sustained by a single company in a few short years. The Times, 18th April 1925

There is that number again: six million. It is truly amazing how often that number crops up in relation to this particular tribe. And so ends our tale. It may be unsurprising, as it is taken for granted now that politicians are a corrupt bunch, but this was the first time the public became aware of how ready and willing they were to sell out their country to foreign powers for personal gain. The Great War that swiftly followed conveniently blotted out most people's memory of the events – but not the Chestertons'. Perhaps it is only fitting to leave the last words to Gilbert Keith, who, upon his brother Cecil's death, published an open letter to Rufus Isaacs in the New Witness, which succinctly addresses the concerns in this article:

Not only is there any question of disliking any race, but there is not here even a question of disliking any individual. It does not raise the question of hating you; rather it would raise, in some strange fashion, the question of loving you. Has it ever occurred to you how much a good citizen would have to love you in order to tolerate you? Have you ever considered how warm, indeed how wild, must be our affection for the particular stray stock-broker who has somehow turned into a Lord Chief Justice, to be strong enough to make us accept him as Lord Chief Justice? It is not a question of how much we dislike you, but of how much we like you; of whether we like you more than England, more than Europe [...] more than honour, more than freedom, more than facts. It is not, in short, a question of how much we dislike you, but of how far we can be expected to adore you, to die for you, to decay and degenerate for you; for your sake to be despised, for your sake to be despicable. Have you ever considered, in a moment of meditation, how curiously valuable you would have to be, that Englishmen should in comparison be careless of all the things you have corrupted, and indifferent to all the things that you may yet destroy? Are we to lose the War which we have already won?

[...]My fancy may be quite wrong; it is but one of the many attempts I have made to imagine and allow for an alien psychology in this matter; and if you, and Jews far worthier than you, are wise, they will not dismiss as Anti-Semitism what may well prove the last serious attempt to sympathise with Semitism. I allow for your position more than most men will allow for it; more, most assuredly, than most men will allow for it in the darker days that yet may come. It is utterly false to suggest that either I or a better man than I, whose work I now inherit, desired this disaster for you and yours, I wish you no such ghastly retribution. Daniel son of Isaac, Go in peace; but go.

A Response to the Burning Question:

By Richard Edmonds

"In what way are the various plans to eradicate the German people after the Second World - the Kaufmann plan, the Hooten plan, the Morgenthau plan and others still in action today?"

Those war time American plans to exterminate the German people are very much in action today. And indeed these wicked plans are now being implemented against all White, European peoples by the process of mass immigration from the fecund populations of the coloured world into our world. For example there has been so much muslim immigration into the British Isles that now the name Mohamet is the top name for baby boys in England (true).

This massive process of mass immigration from the coloured world, which in one form or another has been taking place continuously since the 1950's, is clearly and obviously a political programme designed and implemented with the purpose of displacing and ultimately replacing the White Race in its Homelands.

Let me examine who exactly is behind these plans aimed at the genocide of the White Race. The wicked plans of genocide listed above, the Kaufmann plan, the Hooten plan (Hooten was a professor at Harvard University) and the Morgenthau plan)Morgenthau was a leading war time member of the US President Roosevelt's government): these wicked plans were aimed at the destruction of the German people. But at the very highest levels of the Allied leadership, those who went on to found the United Nations organisation, at the level of President Roosevelt and Josef Stalin and with the acquiescence of Britain's Winston Churchill the war aim of the Allies was the "abolition of racial exclusiveness". This was made absolutely clear in the book written and published at the mid-point of the Second World War in 1943 by the leading US American politician, Wendell Willkie, in his book One World. Wendell Willkie had visited Moscow as Roosevelt's personal representative and spoke of the Soviet leaders whom he met in glowing terms: "These men talked with statesmanship and real understanding as to what the world must be prepared to do after the war was over." Wendell Willkie continued: "Following my return to the USA, Mr. Stalin has defined the programme, as he sees it, of the Anglo - American - Soviet coalition in the European war. He calls for the abolition of racial exclusiveness...."

So we learn that the multi-racial society was conceived by the communist and Soviet leader, Josef Stalin, and endorsed and implemented by western politicians with the consequences that we see today: the coming eradication, extermination, genocide of the White Race.

Fragments of Empire

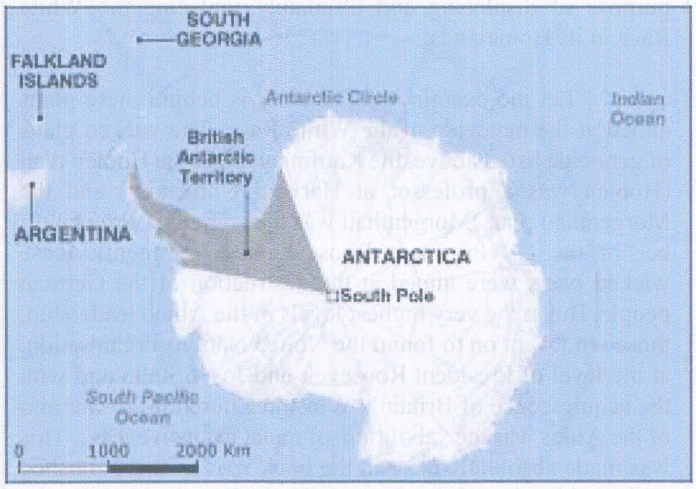
By Rob Black

Part 4

British Antarctic Territory

British claims to Antarctic territory date back to 1908 when the Government extended its claim to existing South Atlantic possessions to include South Georgia, the South Orkneys, the South Shetlands, and the Sandwich Islands, and Graham's Land, situated in the South Atlantic Ocean and on the Antarctic continent to the south of the 50th parallel of south latitude, and lying between the 20th and the 80th degrees of west longitude.

This territory was administered from the Falkland Islands, and the claim was extended to the South Pole in 1917. In 1962, the British Antarctic Territory was formed in its own right, excluding the Falklands, South Georgia and the South Sandwich Islands, and administered from London.



This British Overseas Territory is by far the largest fragment of our Empire. It consists of 660,000 square miles, which makes it seven times larger than the United Kingdom itself. However, 99% of our Antarctic territory is covered by a permanent ice sheet.

Apart from scientific staff from the British Antarctic Survey (BAS), the territory is uninhabited. During summer, there are as many as 400 scientific staff stationed there, and this shrinks to around 50 during the winter months.

The BAS is a component body of the Natural Environment Research Council (NERC), and its scientists carry out vital research in environmental sciences. They were the first to discover the hole in the ozone layer in 1985. There was controversy in 2012 when the NERC, under pressure to save money, proposed that BAS merge with another NERC body. There was an outcry over the plans and under Government scrutiny it transpired that NERC had failed to justify the move on cost or scientific grounds, failed to consult properly, and did not take into account the survey's geopolitical role in the South Atlantic. NERC hastily dropped its merger plans.

The territory is administered by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, who appoint a commissioner. He is always the Head of the FCO's Overseas Territories Department and the current commissioner is Peter Hayes.

The British Antarctic Territory has issued its own postage stamps since 1963, most of which are sold to collectors.

As Britain is a signatory to the 1961 Antarctic Treaty, Article 4 of which states "The treaty does not recognize, dispute, nor establish territorial sovereignty claims; no new claims shall be asserted while the treaty is in force", most countries do not recognise territorial claims in Antarctica. However, the treaty importantly did not dispute existing claims.

Territorial claims on the British Territory are also made by Argentina and Chile, both of which maintain permanent bases on our territory. During the Queen's Golden Jubilee in 2012, we named the southern part of the territory "Queen Elizabeth Land". This drew a predictably childish response from Argentina, which "strongly rejected" Britain's right to rename the area. Our ambassador to Argentina was summoned to explain to officials in Buenos Aires why part of Antarctica was being renamed in honour of the Queen, and he was handed a formal protest note "strongly rejecting" the UK's claim to a piece of land known as the British Antarctic Territory.

The Government has developed a five year strategy for the territory which sets out objectives and funding priorities. The headline objectives of the strategy are:
to ensure the long-term security of the Territory by supporting the UK's high profile within the Antarctic Treaty System to promote the UK's sovereignty of the Territory, including by increasing awareness of British current and historic interests in the region to protect the BAT environment and preserver British heritage to ensure an effective and proportionate legislative and administrative framework which addresses all activities conducted within the Territory to manage the Territory's finances in accordance with best financial practice
Our long term strategic interests in the Antarctic is therefore being maintained and safeguarded. It is important that this is the case, as it may well be that natural resources, which cannot be exploited at present, may prove vital in the future.

End Note:
The main problem facing the British claim to the Territory in the future is the pathetic state of the Royal Navy.

The Great Conspiracy: A Response

By Bill Baillie

europeanoutlook.blogspot.uk

The response to the lead article in issue 855 of Candour, worldwide, has been astonishing and continues to grow. It has brought us many comments by post and email. Overwhelmingly for, but some against, and because of the respect the webmaster Rob Black and myself have for Bill Baillie, who was a member of the League of Empire Loyalists at the age of 16, I am reprinting from Bill's interesting and thought-provoking on-line monthly blog his critique of that article. Bill's blogspot can also be found via our Links page at www.candour.org.uk. Colin Todd. Editor.

In the September 2014 issue of Candour Jez Turner asks the question "Is there a Conspiracy and if there is does it matter? He answers in the affirmative by endorsing AK Chesterton's book Facing the Abyss. Apparently, the Jews are taking over the world and some of us are corrupted by sex, drugs and rock 'n' roll. He may be right about the sex, drugs and rock 'n' roll but he is surely over estimating Jewish power.

The Jewish financier Bernie Madoff ran a Ponzi scheme that stole billions of dollars but Carlo Ponzi, who gave his name to the scam, was a good Catholic.

Bernard Baruch may have hated the British Empire but it was General Tomoyuki Yamashita who ended it when he accepted Lieutenant General Arthur Percival's surrender at Singapore in 1942.

Zionist terrorists committed unspeakable atrocities in Palestine fighting for a national home for the Jews. Most of them were atheists but they propagated the myth that the Jews are God's Chosen People and they convinced Gentiles like Dave Cameron and Barack Obama.

The Jewish banking firm of Kuhn Loeb & Co financed the Bolsheviks but their cousins the Rothschilds backed the Romanovs. Banks lend money to customers according to their credit rating not their politics.

Jews who were discriminated against by the Tsarist regime supported Lenin in the Russian Revolution but many of them perished in the Gulags and forced labour camps of the Stalinist era.

We should avoid theories that explain everything just as we avoid medicines that cure all ailments. AK Chesterton's writing is important but the world has changed since the seventies. The Soviet Union has ceased to exist, China has embraced capitalism, and the collapse of Lehman Brothers in 2008 proves that bankers are not all-powerful. If they could really make money out of nothing they would still be in business.

AK Chesterton's earlier book The New Unhappy Lords charts the fall of the British Empire. We are all proud of the Empire but at its height, in 1913, living conditions for the working class were terrible. Twenty-five percent of the population lived in poverty; fifteen percent at subsistence level and ten percent below subsistence level. Four million working men earned less than thirty shillings a week, which was the minimum needed to keep a wife and three kids. The four million women wage earners were far worse off: probably nine tenths earned less than a pound a week. The average working man lived fifty years and the average working woman fifty-four years. This inequality was swept away by the First World War and the subsequent social revolution.

AK Chesterton wrote in the foreword to The New Unhappy Lords:

"The strength and weakness of this book is that it is not annotated. Its weakness is that the author, having checked his facts to the best of his ability, does not cite his authorities, partly because some of the information has come to him under confidential cover from highly placed sources in different parts of the world who would face ruin if their identities were divulged, and partly because, the facts having been checked as far as that was possible, the sources have not been filed and listed. Its strength, on the other hand, is that the reader is presented with a continuous narrative which enables him to follow the workings of the conspiracy without having his attention distracted by the abundance of footnotes which otherwise would have been necessary."

But we do not need footnotes to understand the decline of the British Empire. It began when we fought the South African War on borrowed money; it was compromised when we accepted American military assistance in 1917; it was undermined by the Wall Street Crash of 1929 and terminated at Bretton Woods in 1944 when we tied the pound to the dollar and placed our armed forces under American command.

Before AK Chesterton resigned as chairman of the National Front in 1970 he issued the following warning:

"The man who thinks this is a war that can be won by mouthing slogans against dirty Jews and filthy ners is a maniac who's place should not be in the National Front but in a mental hospital...A nation once noble and great cannot be rescued from the mire by jackasses who play straight into the enemies hands by giving the public that image of us that the enemy most dearly wants to be given."

His advice was ignored but his books are remembered. He named the men who financed the South African War 1899-1902, the First World War 1914-1918, and the Second World War 1939-1945; three major conflicts in forty-three years that left us totally bankrupt. The Bretton Woods Agreement marked the end of Empire but Britain had to accept America's terms to secure a desperately needed loan. The alternative would have been starvation.

Editor's further notes: I am pleased that we have a genuinely passionate and heavyweight debate going here sparked by several things in succession. Our printing after some forty years of our 5th official edition of AK's New Unhappy Lords in Aug, 2013. (There have been 'pirates') with a forward by former MEP Andrew Brons, which was in itself not uncritical, was followed by a five page review of NUL in Heritage & Destiny, Jan-Feb 2014, by Ian Freeman to which Jez Turner of London Forum responded during his review of our 2nd edition reprint (Aug. 2014) of AK's Facing the Abyss in the Sept. 2014 (855) issue of Candour.
Which should I hope take us back to my introduction at the top of this article! CT.

NATIONALIST NOTES
By Gordon Stridiron
Or What you don't learn from the Politically Correct Media

An excellent selection of notes and quotes, presented A4 format 36 pages, from a friend of Candour. I quote:
"Although this publication was compiled for Geordies in the North East of England I hope it will be of interest to other British patriots who endeavour to make Britain a better place to live in for our people, especially for our children. A place of clean and safe streets, attractive parks, good schools, job opportunities, the promotion of the family way of life and above all a people who wish to serve their community."
Gordon is also the author of the best selling "Blackshirts in Geordieland". (See previous issues for details).

A Right Bunch of Lying "Charlies"!

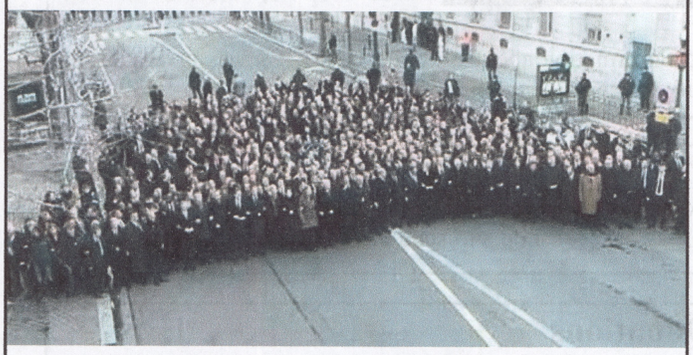
We All Stand Together



Or Do We?

Even the footage of the "Je Suis Charlie" march in Paris following the shootings at the Charlie Hebdo (an extremely unfunny 'satirical' magazine which actually specializes in ANTI- CATHOLICISM) was faked. 2 million people may have marched but the 'world leaders', ie. New World Order stooges, footage was shot separately in a sealed off street elsewhere surrounded by mass security and using a crowd of 'extras' in the background.

This faked footage was then mixed with footage of the actual mass demonstration for media purposes. There were so many people on 'the ground' milling about that no one knew who was there or not or even where the head of the march was.

Lots of stuff on the internet about this. Google things such as 'Fake Paris March' and you'll find videos explaining this and much more in greater detail.

Was there even a shooting at the Kosher 'deli'? Was footage of the gunmen at the Charlie Hebdo offices faked?

Get cynical and

LEARN TO READ BETWEEN THE LINES!

Calm Down Dears

We know that they have always pulled your strings.

As ever they have to overreach themselves and publicly humiliate their puppets.

WE BRITONS WILL REMEMBER THESE PUBLIC DISPLAYS OF TREACHERY AND SELF-ABASEMENT

They must humiliate you (see the above) by degrees in public to prove and show they have the power to.

It is the same way that they use control by peodephilia. They play to the basest weaknesses and on the weakest in society. See them (again above) wave their little placards and 'pray for power'. They know who their masters are.

The Process of Gradualism is being used to grind us down. It has the drip, drip, drip effect of Chinese water torture.

A very recent example of this in relationship to Race. The English actor chappie Benedict Cumberbatch was on some US chat show and used the world 'coloured' to refer to negroes who apparently now insist on being called 'blacks'. You would think he had called for the return of slavery such was the outpouring of false outrage and campaign of vilification that ensued.

Boy, did Cumberbatch grovel in begging for forgiveness. It was revolting. Such was his fear and guilt. Such is the effect of the reconditioning and re-education process of the white race that has taken place in a very few decades and only a couple of generations.

It all gets rather confusing does it not. For example the main organisation, created by Jews, for the alleged emancipation of the negro, which was not intended to empower them but to help destroy us, is still called the NAACP.

That is the National Association for the Advancement of Coloured People).

Paedo-Politicians: Leon Brittan QC Dead

See Candour, July 2014 (No. 854), pg 3. For my article Exposure of Paedo-Politicians: Is it all too Good to be True and you'll realise by now that it almost certainly is. With the death, 21/1/15, of the oleaginous Jewish former Home Secretary under Thatcher it would seem that the truth about vile paedophiles at the heart of the 'British Establishment' will be more difficult than ever to get at. Greville Janner QC is still alive but claiming dementia.

Please note: Where possible I am now including the email addresses of contributors of articles published in Candour under their by-line. This is so that you can contact the writer directly should you wish. C.T.

New CD

Austen Brooks: American Mission

AUSTEN BROOKS

In 1963, Austen Brooks the Deputy Leader of the League of Empire Loyalists and the deputy Editor of Candour undertook an "American Mission" to reinforce our bonds with our American brothers.
This included meeting Major-General Edwin A. Walker (who Lee Harvey Oswald allegedly took a shot at before allegedly shooting President JFK) and many other American patriots as individuals and at meetings throughout the USA. I shall try and work Austen's reports about this into the next issue or certainly soon Austen Brooks: *American Mission is a super addition to our arsenal of information.

Digitally 'cleaned up' having survived being transferred from reel-to-reel to audio cassette and now to CD. Running time approximately 90 minutes..
